The two architectures (Windows and Linux) are simply too far apart as in how they work at the most basic levels for any use to be made of the Windows drivers inside a Linux kernel.. To write a device driver, your starting point must be - how do I 'talk' to this device?Which commands / bitmasks / data do I send to get it to do something? How do I interpret a response?How do I even GET a reponse? Does it encode its data it sends back or compress it? -What- does it send back? How does it communicate?For example, does it send a byte and then a double-word (or even just a word), indicating type and then length-of-response, and then expect a type of strobe-signal from me after which it sends some data, then maybe it waits for another strobe and send the rest, what format is that data in, etc.
